TWO TYPES OF CRUISERS.

Protected and Armored Vessels Compared. It has often been observed that while England has an abundance of protected cruisers and in her new Powerful and Terrible carries the type to enormous displacements, she has paid little attention to the armored cruiser. On the other hand, Russia, which is not at all disingenuous in her protected cruiser class, has built powerful armored cruisers and has carried them to the verge of the fast battle-ship class. If we make comparisons between our New York and Brooklyn, which are distinctively armored cruisers, and British ships which might undertake to meet them, the Blake and the Oregon, perhaps the most suggestive for the purpose. Yet these last are regarded by the British as protected cruisers only, although it is not customary to compare them with our Columbia and Minneapolis, which are distinctively protected cruisers and thorough examples of the unarmored type. The essential distinction, as put by the Pull Mail Gazette, is that the armored cruiser has a great extent of thin armor plating applied vertically to the sides, together with a protective deck at about the level of the water line, while the protected cruiser "has not the vertical plating, but has a thicker deck." As a result, although some shelter is given to her heavier guns by being placed in armored enclosures, she is open to shot and shell above her water line, her most vulnerable parts being exposed to be "wrecked by high explosive." Originally, according to the theory, this sacrifice of speed and coal supply, it being supposed that "the thin sides of the protected cruiser, which are not armor plating, the projectile entering on one side and passing out of the other. The earliest ships of this class in the British navy were the Conqueror and her sister ship, the Displacement, which were fairly clear, they are now so encumbered with machinery and gear that only shells with an unusual capacity for doing work will be able to pass through the ship. Besides, these have been so constructed that the water was not to be taken into the hull, but was to be pumped out by the shell on contact with the water.
